Japan's mounting surpluses and the rising deficits of the United States forced the United States and other leading industrial nations to attempt to realign their currencies, especially the dollar and the yen, in September. The yen's appreciation increased the competitiveness of American products and contributed to the reduction of Japan's external imbalances through when the current account surplus fell by. Whereas long-term capital outflows exceeded Japan's current account surplus from through by the outflow shifted predominantly to short-term capital, and overseas direct investment slowed. I think the person who said it's all about cultural perception had it correct.
